What do I need if I want to use a library?

You don't actually need anything in particular to use a library. Most libraries are open to the general public, which means anyone can go in and read books or use library resources. If you'd like to check library materials out and take them home with you, however, then you'll need to become a library member. The process of doing this is normally different from library to library. Usually you have to pay a registration fee, prove your identity with ID, and get a library card. Luckily, these are not expensive or difficult things to do!

What kind of things can I find in a library?

You can find lots of great things in a library! Maybe you're looking for a new novel to get lost in, a movie to watch over the weekend, or a new musician to discover? Libraries house lots of different materials, and not just books! Many also have audiobooks, films, magazines, newspapers, and CDs that people can borrow. Libraries also offer different programs for children, teenagers, and the community. Maybe you'll find a reading group to share your interest in books with, or even a language course? These things will help you meet new people and practice your language skills.

Why are libraries great resources for language learners?

Language learners can get a lot of use out of a library. If you're in a country that speaks the language you're learning, you'll be able to find lots of books at different reading levels that you can practice with. You could check out movies or music in your target language, or even join in on a library event and meet new people. Some libraries even offer language courses that you could take. All in all, libraries are great resources for language learners, and it's worthwhile to check out what your local library offers!
