In the United States, the measurement feet is commonly used when giving directions. Someone will most likely tell you how many feet you need to walk to your destination when it is close by. This is because one foot is quite small. One foot is equal to about 30 centimeters and one meter is made up of about 3.2 feet.

Cross this street, then turn left and walk about a block

A block is a measurement of distance that is very commonly used in the United States. One block equals the distance between two intersections that are connected by one street. You'll most likely hear this measurement of distance being used in directions if you travel to a city in the US. Cities there are often neatly organized into blocks, so that the city itself becomes like a grid. Because of this, it's easy to use these blocks as references for distance.

The United States measures distance quite differently from most other countries. The main measurements used are miles and feet. Most other English-speaking countries use primarily kilometers and meters to measure distance. However, some actually use a mix of both. The United Kingdom for example officially uses the metric system (kilometers and meters), but the imperial system (miles and feet) is still commonly used in daily life. When giving directions in a city, Americans would also use blocks to indicate the distance between two intersections that are connected by one street.
